If you are using Opera Mail and want to restore emails, contacts, calendars, etc., from previous backups, then this is the right tool for you. If you want to convert any file types from the Opera Mail browser, then this is the best alternative to Opera Mail Converter. The program is free and does not require any configuration or installation. It is also highly compatible with all popular email clients, including Thunderbird, Outlook, AOL, Eudora, etc. Everyone knows about the upcoming "I, Pencil," the upcoming feature film based on the colorful, cult comic series created by Craig Thompson, the artist behind "Helvetica." He's the one who introduced to the world a pencil with dozens of interchangeable erasers. But few know about the "I, Pencil" book he's also released. Thompson tells NPR, the two-part book was the "fruit of almost two years of work" and that it "takes you on a tour of an imaginary alternate universe created by me." Narrated by Dave it's a children's book with a clever premise: As a 6-year-old, Thompson thinks about how people use pencils. "But then it goes into this sort of weird alternate reality that I created." As the book tells us, every little boy and girl has one sharp pencil in the world, and in Thompson's reality, each pencil was actually one of many eraser-like items that could be swapped out. Some were actually marketed that way, he tells NPR. In his reality, erasers were developed, and the Sharpie company even asked Thompson if he wanted to collaborate on one of their famous markers. So the story begins: Dave has one sharp pencil in the world, and he's always drawing with it. "Maybe it's a movie, maybe it's a doodle," he imagines. "And then he goes off to school, and somebody else wants the pencil." And the rest of the story is a tour of a world where it's possible to use lots of different things as pencils. The book includes tutorials on how to use, say, a nail file, or a kitchen knife, or a rolled-up piece of sheet music. Dave, we imagine, eventually falls in love with his sharp pencil and just sticks with it. The I, Pencil book was released in October. But thanks to Thompson's other big project, the upcoming feature film about 70238732e0

The Department of Veterans Affairs on Monday announced that it would not fire three of its senior officials connected to a massive data-mining scandal, after a federal judge ordered the agency to reconsider those employees' firings. The order, released by U.S. District Court Judge Thomas W. Phillips in Pittsburgh, suspends the firing of former Veterans Health Administration chief of staff Sharon Helman and her top deputies, Sean A. Yoms, and Cynthia Moss, until the VA can prove it has a legitimate reason to remove them from their positions. The directive comes as the VA prepares to fire 20 senior agency officials, including Helman and Moss, over their role in the VHA's wide-ranging efforts to cull patient data from medical records. The suspensions affect a small fraction of the roughly 32,000 employees involved in the misconduct and fraud, which was uncovered by a Pittsburgh Tribune-Review investigation that exposed the widespread efforts to strip patient data from some 42 million records.
Q: I can't "apply" a second keystroke to Chrome in Python 3, how do I do it? So I'm using Python 3.7.2 and the PyCharm community edition on Windows 10, using the Chrome browser. I'm trying to make a simple script that just opens Chrome, opens the page with a web browser, and goes to the search bar on the page. So it's `import os os.system('chrome.exe')` os.system('chrome.exe ') And it works fine, until I want to add one more line: os.system('chrome.exe ') os.system('chrome.exe ')

And instead of sending both commands at once it only sends the second command, the one to double-click on. This is the full
