It replaced the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) which was signed in January 1994. The main objective of the trade agreement is to lower barriers between North America's three largest economies. To achieve this goal, the agreement had several benefits and concessions to the three countries involved. Appliances, clothing, and agricultural goods were the first items affected by the new agreement. The biggest concessions came from the United States with a larger trade zone, zero tariffs on most goods, a lower quota on goods and faster approval of subsidized goods. The Canadian concessions included access to a vast market of the United States, lower tariffs and fewer import restrictions. Mexico benefited from lower duties on manufactured goods, slightly better access to the American market, and a larger trade zone. The overall advantage was the removal of barriers to the flow of goods, money, and services across the United States-Mexican border. The agreement allowed for the free flow of goods across North America. In theory, this means that all US, Canadian, and Mexican goods and services will be subject to less interference from the government. It was also hoped that the new agreement would result in more business as companies will now have a much larger...
