Download.Schools in London are to look for more than a passing grade when assessing the behaviour of their pupils, in a move that will be welcomed by teachers and parents alike. In a move that will see children taken into care if they are disruptive or are too slow to do homework, head teachers will be able to look at "situational reports" when deciding whether to dismiss a pupil. One head teacher said the move to ensure that children "reach a level of academic achievement that enables them to cope" with life outside the classroom was not only essential but a legal requirement. Peter Lloyd, head of catering and school food at Dulwich College, said he was determined to implement the government's new requirements, although the system would need work before it could be rolled out. "It seems that in the past it has been a case of doing the bare minimum," he said. "My view is that to dismiss a child has to be the last resort." Research by the Association of School and College Leaders has found that head teachers are reluctant to send pupils to an alternative educational setting - such as a detention centre - because of the stigma of expulsion and the need to send parents a letter. "This will give heads much more of an opportunity to intervene, more so than if we are sending
