state analysis of the 2018 midterms paints a picture of a deeply divided nation, with clear partisan signals even among groups that traditionally hold some common ground. A new analysis of data from the National Exit Poll, a long-running data set that tracks political interest and voter turnout, finds that the 2018 midterms featured a deep, partisan divide along racial, religious and education lines, among other groups. But while the 2018 midterms featured the most raw racial polarization the U.S. has seen in decades, the new analysis also finds that voters of color, in particular, were more likely to oppose the president and have higher rates of voter turnout than in prior midterms. The findings follow an earlier analysis of the same set of data, which found that the percentage of non-college educated voters—a group that has been more resistant to the Democratic Party’s leftward shift—increased in 2018 and voted for President Donald Trump at higher rates than in prior midterms. The new analysis adds to a growing body of evidence that 2018’s results were more partisan than in previous cycles, yet also found that groups traditionally united by ideology and ideology’s impact on policy, such as conservatives and evangelicals, were much more likely to vote along partisan lines. This new analysis, published in the journal Perspectives on Politics, found that nonwhites, college-educated voters, and registered Democrats were more likely to vote for Democrats in 2018 compared to 2014, while the opposite was true for black voters, non-college-educated voters, and registered Republicans. “Across all three groups, the increase in partisan voting was more dramatic than in the 2012 and 2014 midterms,” said study author Ashley J. Tellis, a senior fellow at the libertarian Cato Institute. “2d92ce491b
