programmingHello, I'm new to the forum, and I am currently working on my video card to output to a projector. Do any of the results seen here on the backplate look like the right ones or would I need to change something to get them to the right place? Before trying to deal with the backplate I was planning on getting some help from someone who has messed with this before. I have a little money saved for a future video card buy so I'd like to get this done right. I cannot really tell what you are talking about. Did you install the video card, or are you talking about the backplate that the video card will be mounted on? If you have installed the video card already then the backplate will be installed at this point. Hey, I just wanted to let you know that I put that in about 2 weeks ago. I was really happy with the results. Now the final (almost finished) custom backplate and mounting bracket. Click on "R07" for a picture. I did a little trial and error with putting it in different places and saw the current position looked best. I got side by side pictures. I decided to leave the optical drive covered. There is a power button and a camera/VGA cable port, the left 3.5 jack, and an audio port. I was really worried about the power button, I was afraid of pinching off the traces, but I'm very happy with the way it turned out. My video card is an EVGA GTX 280 Superclocked. I just wanted to say thank you for this awesome template for these custom backplates. I've made a few, as well as a custom motherboard which includes the backplate. I did a couple of things on my templates, which I thought were pretty cool. First, since the backplate is in the way of the sound card, I drew a diagonal line with a marker from the front edge of the backplate, to the place of the sound card. This way, the speaker holes are left empty, but make a nice edge to the sound card. Second, I took my testing method and started
