One of the html element I want to enable at a time is id="city-time" and id="country-time". Once the page loads, the country-time element is disabled and enabled when the country drop down changes. My question is how do I run a function when the page loads so that the country-time element is disabled? I want something like this if document.ready function==true then do something A: The most flexible way is probably to use an event like a change. You have to pass the function a reference to a variable you can reference later. // bind the event to something that exists already on the page $('#selector').on('change', function() { // do something }); // execute something that is defined in the global namespace // so the code executes once when the page loads window.doSomething = function () { // do something } // for these variables to be available when the event fires // you can use an IIFE var select = $('#selector'); var doSomething = window.doSomething
