kidney and ileum contain more E- and P-selectins than lymph nodes and skin. Migration of leukocytes to inflammatory sites is a crucial step in a variety of inflammatory and immune reactions. In this study, we measured the concentrations of E-selectin, P-selectin and P-selectin glycoprotein ligand-1 (PSGL-1) in the tissues of mice in vivo, and we found that bone marrow, ileum, kidney and skin contained more E- and P-selectin and PSGL-1 than lymph nodes. The amounts of E- and P-selectins in the livers of mice were below the detection limit, but the amounts of PSGL-1 were significantly higher than in other tissues. Intravenously injected leukocytes were distributed throughout the body. However, at 1 h, E-selectin was detected in the peripheral blood, but not in the bone marrow, indicating that circulating leukocytes might be able to interact with each other through E-selectin. These data provide the first evidence that different cell types contain different amounts of E- and P-selectins. Florida State researchers have developed a unique map showing how birds
