In a previous population genetic study we found a high degree of genetic exchange (recombination) at the permissive ends of chromosomes in Leishmania major. To investigate this further, we have used the Chudley dataset to determine the relative incidence of genetic recombination in the arms of the chromosomes and the relationship of the recombination frequency to nucleotide composition and/or AT-content (the relative base composition of the coding sequences) of the DNA. As we had anticipated, recombination was very common at the permissive ends of chromosomes and we also found a high incidence of recombination on the chromosome arms. The recombination frequency was closely correlated with both AT-content and nucleotide composition. In addition, since recombination is associated with selection for advantageous mutations, we can suggest that the high frequency of recombination at the permissive ends of the chromosomes is indicative of selection pressure for genetic variability.Q: MySQL Replication: How to automatically refresh the replication on client side I'm using MySQL Replication on my server and mysql-bench on client side. This replication has a few steps to perform: create a copy on slave server end-to-end tests (on slave server) copy the database on master server. Some operation, such as delete all tables on master, will make the replication fail on step 2, so I need to force the client to stop the replication manually. It would be great if I can automatically refresh the replication by receiving the crash so I don't have to stop it manually. Is this possible? A: I'm not certain if that is possible for MySQL replication (you may know if this is for MyISAM replication), but I know that if this is possible, it is for the Master

He put on a show, dropped a mint on the Mavs' two-man layup line of Luka Doncic and Kristaps Porzingis and one-handed blow dunked, and the crowd roared it out like the soloists at the Martin Luther King Jr. service in Washington, DC. But I would argue that Leonard's final on-court moment, his final shot, a baseline three-pointer with 19.7 seconds left, was as much a product of his mental strength and leadership skills as his awe-inspiring athleticism and showmanship. (Or maybe I'm just trolling. Either way, let's go with it.) SAN ANTONIO — Kawhi Leonard enters Friday night's nationally televised showdown with the Toronto Raptors with a perfect 7-for-7 record in this Round 1 knockout round series, having scored 27 points while shooting 8-for-10 from the field and 12-for-12 on threes in his two victories thus far. But part of what makes Leonard so good is his ability to play without the ball, to create for others, to be the eighth guy on the floor, to take advantage of the Raptors' lack of bigs because his big body and fearless defense allow him to match up with anyone, anytime. That's the kind of intangibles that are at the heart of his winning ways, and it's been on full display in this series. The advanced stats even support it. In the second quarter of Game 3 on Wednesday, Leonard had scored just seven points on four shots, which explains why the Raptors were, and are, up by 15. Yet, he went back to the bench
