Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac are betting on blockchain technology to move away from the old style of credit scoring. In May, Fannie Mae announced a partnership with Chain, a blockchain start-up founded by Michael O'Hare and Dimitrios Skaltsis, to create a "shared ledger" that gives consumers more access to information. Nasdaq is also working with Australia's technology company Datum on a blockchain-based tool that can be used to identify fraudulent financial services accounts. In the U.S., the announcement was met with a mixed reception, with some commentators applauding the blockchain concept as a long overdue innovation in the credit industry while others questioned whether it was too early to be implementing blockchain technology for credit scoring. It's a problem that several companies are trying to solve. "At this point, I don't think we have a good sense of the users we are going to see on the platform as we move through the growing pains of initial adoption," said Jenny Choi, a vice president in Fannie Mae's Private Markets Group, in an interview with CNBC. Fannie Mae, a government-sponsored enterprise, is in the mortgage business and provides loans to consumer, business, government and other organizations. "We view the shared ledger technology as more of an enabler on the back end," she said. Blockchain, the technology behind bitcoin and other cryptocurrencies, works on a peer-to-peer distributed network. It would be similar to a private messaging platform like WhatsApp or Facebook Messenger, but a private, secure platform designed for sharing financial data and information. Many people have a positive view of blockchain, as it changes the power structure of the financial services and banking industry and provides transparency into the products that banks and other financial institutions offer. Blockchain is also used to cut costs, as it can help streamline internal processes. How it works F
