During the months before the first cloning, MCB2 cells travel via the hind end of the embryo to their destination, the mid-hind end boundary, where they congregate and become integrated into the developing animal, initiating the hind end budding. d. Kepa in 2010 A REDS-like gene has been implicated in controlling the midgut phenotype in Xenopus laevis, the African clawed frog. This gene is expressed in the endoderm of the dorsal blastoporal lip of early Xenopus embryos at the time of hindgut endoderm formation. Since the ventral hindgut primordium develops and differentiates into the ventral hindgut before the dorsal blastoporal lip becomes visible by histological stains, it is likely that this gene is also involved in the early development of the ventral hindgut [100]. There are other genes that have a similar role in Xenopus, such as the Nodal homologue XNodal and DAN. e. Newsela in 2015 In an exciting advance, a team of researchers has created a 3D culture system that mimics the early stages of vertebrate hindbrain development. Using the 3D system, they have shown that a neural crest-like cell fates before it forms a neural tube. The system includes a culture dish of protein extract in which cells are free to branch, grow, and develop as they do normally. d. Rerink in 2015 These mini-droplets of protein solution can be used to create 3D cell culture models that mimic the complex 3D environment of vertebrate embryos. By fabricating these mini-droplets using two-photon microscopy, the authors were able to show the dynamic changes that cells take when they are cultured in 3D. They found that cells can undergo gastrulation changes, and that they also generate different types of endoderm-like cell lines, which could be useful for studying early embryonic foregut development. e. Ridley in 2009 The ventral forebrain in mouse or frog embryos can be considered to be a heterogeneous tissue. This means that it is made up of, or composed of, different cell types. The ventral forebrain is made up of two populations of neurons: (1) dorsal forebrain (olfactory bulb, ventral telencephalon, and lateral ganglionic eminence) and (2) ventral forebrain (diencephalon). There are also different types of cells within these

Due to human health, air quality, and economic risks of geoengineering, the scientific community has conducted comprehensive reviews to determine the potential of this technique as a viable option for global environmental preservation. Nevertheless, no evidence suggests that geoengineering is yet cost-effective as a long-term global strategy. The most common and easiest way to deliver and store data using streaming is Internet video. Streaming has become a great source of revenue for the online streaming media industry. YouTube was born this way, and has become the most popular video sharing website. Since Google acquired YouTube, Google has made improvements to its service. One of the most recent features was the introduction of Google TV. Users can watch online videos with Google TV, but can also stream TV, movies, music, and radio stations through the service. As a way of keeping up with the streaming media industry, Google has also built a Google TV app store for Android devices, which allows users to browse and download videos, TV shows, music, and other forms of media that can be played back on their devices. Along with these new services, the mobile platforms have also integrated the live streaming video. Social networks sites such as Facebook, MySpace, Bebo, and LinkedIn are very useful for keeping in touch with current and former friends and acquaintances. Most of the sites have local presence in North America, Western Europe, India, China, and Japan. They allow their users to upload photos and communicate with one another through text or multimedia. It is a type of social network profile built specifically for academics, researchers and faculty users. Staff can upload CV, high resolutions of their photos and information about their research, they can put their location information and their interests and hobbies in their profile. My staff profiles are private and accessible only by Staff accounts. GEO5 is a groupware that allows the users to share, collate 3e33713323
