Field of the Invention The invention relates to a device for converting mechanical energy to electrical energy.

More particularly, the invention relates to a generator providing electrical energy from rotation of a shaft. More specifically, the invention relates to a mechanical energy/electrical energy converter which is capable of converting rotary mechanical energy to electrical energy. Still more particularly, the invention relates to an apparatus for automatically supplying electricity to a load without reliance on a motor or other primary power source. 2.

Description of the Related Art Mechanical energy sources such as waterwheels, windmills, and the like, are sometimes used to provide electrical power, either for remote areas having no electric power, or for areas having electric power that is distributed to various equipment on a user's property. In other instances, mechanical energy is used to supply motive force to agricultural equipment or used in industrial applications. A device that converts rotary mechanical energy to electrical energy is useful for remote areas where electrical power is unavailable or when electrical power is distributed in a manner that is inefficient for specific purposes or areas. A device that converts rotary mechanical energy to electrical energy can be used to power pumps that move liquids or air. Such a device would be useful for power production on boats and other vehicles. The invention is particularly useful for remote, boat powered oil rigs or other vehicles having such a device to convert rotary mechanical energy to electrical power.

Boat operators normally have a source of boat motor fuel such as diesel fuel, or alternatively an engine driven generator. If the generator is not running, they must depend upon the battery to operate the boat's electrical systems and pumps. The engine or generator provides current to operate lights, the boat's radios, the watermaker, and the like.
