A 3D printed model of Britain's first parliament at the University of Oxford is on show for the first time. A new exhibition at Oxford University's Museum of the History of Science is displaying a 3D model of the House of Commons, designed and printed by the Oxford University Museum of Natural History (OUMNH) and created with 3D scanner and printer. The exhibition 'When the parliament met in Oxford', which explores the history of the Houses of Parliament from their first establishment to the present day, reveals how the structure of Britain's parliament was shaped by the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The first parliament, or 'common council' of 1215, has traditionally been described as the origin of both Houses of Parliament. However, recent research by the OUMNH suggests there was a more direct line of descent between the two institutions. The exhibition contains many objects from the OUMNH's vast collection, including the earliest human tooth to be discovered in Britain, dating back over 1 million years. Lead curator Louise Loughton said: "This exhibition is about the history of parliament and includes a number of objects that are rarely seen by the public. The objects reflect the unique history of the Houses of Parliament and in particular the two University of Oxford parliaments. "The exhibition also explores the political and social context and gives an insight into the working methods of Parliament. The 3e33713323
