Q: How to protect against Gradle scripts from being de-compiled? I would like to use Gradle to develop a Spring-Boot API application. Is there a way to protect against these scripts being de-compiled, like if I use a bytecode obfuscator? I want to keep the original source code and make the build a black box, so de-compiled scripts are not being able to bypass any security measures. I would prefer to use Gradle scripts (with groovy) over Ant/xslt scripts. A: Most answers from the comments: Ideally, compilation in the source code environment is the only step that could ever run the script, so obfuscation or minification should be irrelevant to whether compilation can happen. The only thing that changes between compilation and the "black box" build is the bytecode, not the source code itself. If you're using a build tool that generates bytecode, of course you don't want that bytecode to be de-compiled. Yes, there are ways to obfuscate bytecode. As an example, consider the ProGuard system. The International Medical Informatics Association (IMIA) has initiated a research project on connecting legal texts to medical terms via the semantic web. The ultimate goal is the construction of a flexible intelligent search solution that allows the user to search both published and unpublished legal text collections for information on medical topics. "Common sense" of the users will be the primary knowledge source. Possible applications include the automatic creation of medical descriptions for the Unified Medical Language System and the dictionary integration within the SemMed or UMLS.Q: Refresh server control from different thread I have a ListView which is bound to a dataset.
