Luvos CMOS-3D 4K Ultra HD Camera Review Some of the features I was looking forward to in this camera are the ability to control the focus and iris through the camera, as well as post processing via the HDMI port, the wireless capabilities and the many different mounting options. The first issue I came across when I opened the camera is that the battery is glued in. This issue means that you can't put the battery in until after you've removed the HD hot shoe. The fact that it's glued in is also a good indication of how much this camera will cost. It's supposed to have a price tag of $1495 (SRP $3949), and you can't even check if the camera has the features you're paying for without taking the battery out and using a display. When you get the camera out of the box, you're greeted with the remote control, two mounting posts and a USB cable. The remote control is designed in a very ergonomic way, and has a directional pad for controlling the focus and iris and several buttons for manually controlling the focus. It's all designed to be easy to use, but unfortunately the camera itself is pretty difficult to set up and requires two people to set up. That's because of the lack of display on the camera, which means you need a display in order to look at the settings for the camera

- 4 4.85 8,680 VolcanoCam is an open source web widget that allows users to view up to 4 live webcam feeds at once. It also allows users to view each webcam feed for an adjustable amount of time, before There are several webcam feeds available online that are for research purposes or geological survey, including a range of live webcams that monitor volcanoes worldwide. VolcanoCam is a widget that allows users to monitor up to four different webcam feeds at once, with various preset volcano cam URLs included in the program as standard. When users first open the widget and view VolcanoCam, it becomes immediately apparent how it works and how to operate it. There is no ambiguity in the design, even users who are not familiar with how webcam feeds work will be able to set up the different feeds and cameras. Each feed provides a Change button underneath it, which allows users to select from the included list of feeds. It is possible to also enlarge a single feed, making it take up the entire widget screen and hide the other three feeds if one is of greater interest. Despite the emphasis on volcanoes, the application can be used to display any webcam feed Even though the program is very obviously based around volcano watching, it allows users to set up their own custom feeds and input custom URLs. This effectively means the widget can be used to display any webcam feed within the widget, providing VolcanoCam with far more versatility than perhaps the developers originally intended. The refresh speed of the different feeds can be adjusted via the number of minutes, widget cannot be made to refresh a feed faster than once every minute, so it is still suited to slower feeds. The opacity of the widget can also be changed to make it less obtrusive, as well as the option to lock it in place and disable dragging. A surprisingly useful application that provides a significant amount of versatility in an accessible form While VolcanoCam seems to be originally designed as an interesting widget to study volcanoes and appreciate geological landmarks, it could easily be used as a general webcam feed widget. VolcanoCam is simple to use and easy to configure and customize, making it a very robust widget that users should find satisfying. Reviews What's New We have prepared an update to our VolcanoCam application. Version 1.0.7 of VolcanoCam fixes a bug that could cause the application to crash on recent mobile devices. We appreciate your feedback and thank you for your support! The following changes are included in this release: - Added a preference to disable resizing to the custom feed box. - Added in a bug fix for the preset URL camera feed. - You can now change the style of the custom feed box using the new preference. - The new preference allows users to change the style of the custom feed box. - Added in an option to lock
