Source: This invention relates to a temperature compensated crystal oscillator, and more particularly, to such a crystal oscillator which is temperature compensated to vary a frequency of the crystal oscillator depending upon the temperature of the oscillator or a temperature of a system incorporating the oscillator. The crystal oscillator is a device for generating a periodic signal and is widely used for generating a clock signal which is a standard signal. The crystal oscillator is used for a time reference of a computer or a communication system, and hence it is very important for the crystal oscillator to produce a periodic signal which is stable in frequency and has minimal frequency fluctuations in spite of a temperature change of the oscillator. The crystal oscillator is generally equipped with a temperature compensation circuit and a temperature compensation function is an important factor to stabilize the frequency of the crystal oscillator. A temperature compensated crystal oscillator which has a temperature sensor has been developed to stabilize the frequency of the oscillator depending upon the temperature of the oscillator or a temperature of a system incorporating the oscillator. The crystal oscillator of this type is generally a monolithic ceramic oscillator or a microelectromechanical (M
