The invention relates to a plug connector for plugging electrical devices, in particular consumer appliances, such as water heaters or dishwashers, to one another. Plug connectors of the aforementioned type for connecting electrical devices to one another are known. With a plug connector of this type, the plug region of the electrical device to be connected is plugged into a housing of the plug connector, wherein the plug connector comprises a plugging connector part that is embodied in the shape of a base body having a receiving opening, which is open towards the front and which has a contact device on its rear side, wherein the plugging connector part comprises an electrical contact device and a contacting device for contacting the contact device of the base body. In electrical devices, for example in dishwashers, the electrical connections and/or electrical devices are subjected to constant vibrations. Therefore, many manufacturers and users have the wish to further miniaturize electrical devices and, thus, the plug connectors of the plug connector of the electrical device as well. However, the miniaturization of electrical devices also causes problems, such as, for example, the resulting lower strength of the plug connector, that is, the base body, and, thus, the strength of the entire plug connector, which leads to an increased susceptibility to cracking or breaking under the effects of vibration. Cell adhesion molecules are involved in the neural development and regeneration processes. This study investigated the expression of three cell adhesion molecules, i.e. NCAM, N-CAM and L1, in the developing and regenerating sciatic nerve of rats. The expression of each molecule was analyzed by immunohistochemistry and Western blotting at three ages, i.e., from day 4 to day 60 of postnatal development, and from day 0 to day 20 after nerve injury. The immunohistochemistry demonstrated that NCAM and N-CAM were present in the
