It's easy to write down notes on paper, on the wall or even on your computer using its full-screen and high-quality handwriting input. Notes on Security, Privacy and User Experience Design Oct 9, 2015 By Sigismund Goldstein The posts in this series are essays on the design, architecture, security, and resilience of our Mobile Operating Systems. With the advent of smartphones and tablets, the original notion of "Information" has changed dramatically. We now use the network connection of a Personal Computer, to fetch both the Internet, and the data it contains. This new configuration has given rise to an ecosystem of technologies and protocols that no more separate these two entities, but rather bring them closer together. Additionally, what once was a client and server communication, has somehow turned into a peer-to-peer or e-reputation messaging system. How should we deal with it then, both from a user experience perspective and in regards to the delicate balance between privacy and the freedom to use personal data, on the one hand, and the principles of security, on the other? How many times has a user felt it wrong to watch a full movie in a public place? How many times has a user been upset after receiving a private and confidential e-mail from a friend, only to find out she had been forwarding the message to the world? The applications themselves can be either paranoid, or even malicious. For example, some mobile games use your location data to decide the gameplay itself, such as driving you over the roads of a city that you were previously in. What does that mean? Not only that they stalk you, they also "infer" from your roaming habits that you may be a Communist or an Anarchist. Or, the reverse: does the same principle applies to your private contact list, where the application starts to send out e-mails to people you have not told you were your e-mail contacts, but rather data that it, itself, has "inferred" from your last activity? The following theoretical essays will attempt to address these very issues. The Web of data I. The acquisition of data and its monetization through Advertising II. The future of the IoT While e-reputation may sound great in theory, how can the public verify the credibility of a certain piece of information they have encountered on the Internet

What's New in the Notezilla Portable?

Sticky Notes for Windows, Mac, Linux and Android. Free Notes, templates, themes, stickers, collections, sticky note lists and so much more. StickyNotes is free to use and has no limit on what types of notes you can create. The Midori Browser is a complete web browser that brings speed and ease to web surfing with extensions, a built-in speech engine, and a new approach to privacy. Like a kitten, it is small, cute, and it makes you purr.Midori is designed to be fast, lightweight, and not take a lot of RAM. It is also designed to be completely open, and completely free. Viruses and malware are a bigger problem on the desktop, but the browser has been designed to run securely from the start. When infected, apps may behave in non-normal ways, including by sending out your personal data without your consent. Midori, however, is a browser that keeps no secrets. The default privacy policy is very clear, and refuses to track user activities. Midori keeps no logs, and has to know nothing of your personal data. In short, Midori is a truly open source browser. But Midori is more than just open source software. It is also an open network. Midori stands for the alliance of many projects, and also for the interest of global collaboration. And it is also a search engine. Thanks to its built-in search engine (called AIML), it is built on top of Mozilla's AIML engine, and it has access to some of Mozilla's hosted AIML databases. CubeSurf is a file manager, web browser, webcam viewer and chat client. It is also a content manager, and it includes tools that help you find and manage your images. By default, CubeSurf opens web pages in your default web browser, but it can easily be set to open your web browser with a specific website. The operating system is not a part of the software, but CubeSurf requires Java. WebCoordinates is a new open-source concept of webpages having different coordinates of points, in which visually impaired people with the use of a computer or access to information technology are able to find the most appropriate room where they want to go or find the most suitable place for providing the information they need. This point of interest can be the room, the place or any other location that suits the needs of the visually impaired, who can find it
