You are here Sunday, September 27, 2011 As my last free day in the tropics before I head back to the colder climes of Pennsylvania, I stopped in San Juan, Puerto Rico on my way out of the country on a layover. The city itself is beautiful, and I would recommend it as a tropical port-of-call if you're passing through. So I stayed in a hotel that let me check in for free by showing my passport. I got the special waffle-breakfast, and it was more than I hoped for. You are apparently encouraged to eat, sleep, and spend your remaining time on the isle in a state of beautiful bliss. On my way out of the hotel though, the man at the front desk demanded my passport. He told me that I needed to fill out a small form. How could I have not done that, but a few days earlier I might have. Oh, yes, a form. He also said to check out the shipwreck. "It's really neat," he said. "You'll be able to see the ship from the point at which it hits the reef. Then you'll have to go down, and walk through a
