Sintered metal preforms, i.e., hollow metal articles having a uniform porous microstructure, are well known in the art. It is generally desired to use such sintered metal preforms in articles of manufacture that will experience high stress, such as aerospace structural components. The relative ease with which a sintered metal preform can be substantially converted to a finished article of manufacture is the most significant advantage of sintered metal preforms. This conversion is made possible by hot forming the pre
