Using a Realistic Vision By this point in the semester, the students are well along their journey of making an already challenging film a reality. The film has been tweaked, rewritten, re-programmed, pre-rolled, refitted, and so on. But as much as possible, they are keeping to their original vision. However, when dealing with a documentary, the film must be about more than just your vision; it has to be about the world. So let's discuss what this means in the context of a documentary. To start, I must admit that I am a huge fan of documentaries, especially ones that take place in real time and show us a series of events that happened over a period of time. It's these kinds of films that have a much larger impact on us because it gives us the whole picture. If the average person didn't know how the modern day World Trade Center came to be, then they would just look at the building and say "what is that?” The people who did the modern day World Trade Center did not just plan to have that building in place. They planned to be a part of the creation of a new World Trade Center. If you were not there when the two buildings came down, you would likely have no idea what they were. But what this means is that a documentary has to make sure that the people, places, and ideas of the world are the focus. How well a documentary is able to do this and get the information across will determine how well the film succeeds. For the documentary that I have so far, the subjects are “Great Smokies” which contains a variety of very specific topics ranging from the biology of a Giant Salamander to the history of Rock/Creek wrestling. While the bulk of this documentary may be the history of Rock/Creek wrestling, the information is conveyed so well, that the viewer may not realize that they are in a documentary. The film will be about the science of the Giant Salamander, the history of Rock/Creek wrestling, and the phenomenon of Rock/Creek wrestling,
