This is part of my program, in which I take a user-given sentence as input. sentences = input("Enter your sentence: ").split() numbers = [] numbers.append(0) my_list = [] for number in sentences: number = int(number) my_list.append(number) print my_list count = 0 for list in my_list: if list > 0: count += 1 print count This code works fine, but it takes a while for it to finish, and it's a really simple program. Is there anything I can do to make it run faster? I'm a beginner so that's quite a lot for me to ask. I also have a feeling this is a fundamental flaw, so if you can point out what it is I'd really appreciate it. Thanks! A: Consider using python's built in sequence functionality to create a single list of numbers (and only numbers): numbers = list(map

Jan 26, 2012 Being a sequel to Driver he wanted to capitalize on the popularity of the sequel and make it more of .fans have been let down time he played this game I'm not sure if the first game was the most enjoyable game for me and if I will be giving him this game as a gift. The whole time we played the first game we were really impressed with the quality of the graphics and the first time around we didn't have a lot of up-close-and-personal opportunities. With Driver San Francisco we're going to see more of the full body of the cars as well as some memorable characters coming out of the shadows. This new game brings us a whole new world of trouble. All of the cars have their place and you know the companies need to put their products up on the screen because the whole time we're playing it it's the fifth company that has put their product up and it's really really impressive.
