Now, I am wondering why the `__str__` method on the child process does not print anything. Here is my code: `from subprocess import Popen, PIPE, call import os def C(func, a): c = Popen([func] + [a], universal_newlines=True, stdout=PIPE) ret = c.communicate() return ret[0] def run_script(arg1, arg2, pid): pid = os.fork() if pid == 0: print 'Ch', print C(os.execvp, arg1) + arg2 print arg1 + ':' + arg2 else: print 'You are the ' + str(pid) + ' and arg1:' + arg1 + ' arg2:' + arg2 run_script('foo', 'bar', 0)` Note that, when I comment out the print statement in the child process, I do indeed see the output message printed to the terminal. Edit: I use python 2.7.2, on a mac. A: A process prints the result of a function to the standard output, and with `c.communicate(block=True)` the program never finishes when reading from the subprocess' standard output. Write something to a file instead: `def run_script(arg1, arg2, pid): pid = os.fork() if pid == 0: print 'Ch',`

YouTube Vanced .Currently, some mobile carriers are selling device onusicals, which are “software installs” that can be stored on the device's internal storage which can improve call quality and battery life. These onusicals, however, are not always pre-loaded on the device, and can therefore often need to be updated by the user after they have been placed on the device. For example, if the desired onusical or firmware update causes the bootloader of the device to become locked, it is sometimes necessary to wipe the device or re-flash with a new version of the bootloader. Additionally, if the onusical or firmware update requires special permissions or knowledge to perform, then the device will be placed in a state where the user needs to perform the actions required to update the device. Users of mobile devices (e.g., a smart phone) sometimes perform these actions manually by downloading the update, performing the necessary actions to update the device manually, or performing some other manual method. Additionally, some communication/other devices can utilize methodologies that can manually perform the necessary steps needed to update the device. In other instances, the user may have to place the device in a special mode to enable the necessary onusical to update to the device. In some cases, the device must be taken off-line (e.g., turned off) to enable the update of the software to the device. As used herein, “off-line” and “off-line state” mean that the device is not connected to a wireless network and is not connected to any other device via a personal area network. Furthermore, users can remove the onusical update if the update fails, so they might have to perform the steps
