See, for example, U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,624,401; 4,886,662; 4,987,462 and 5,309,177. The resonator comprises a thin walled, open ended shell which is suspended by a support structure from the bottom of a supporting floor, ceiling, wall or other structure and which resonates mechanically at relatively high frequencies. The support structure includes acoustic signal radiators which are positioned in the resonator so that they are spatially separated from the shell but which couple energy into the shell so that the shell vibrates at its resonant frequencies of up to about 10,000 Hz. The shell of the resonator further includes a sound absorbing material which is positioned within the shell so that the shell vibrates with sound waves in the shell which are largely plane waves parallel to the major axis of the shell. One problem that arises with the use of such a device is that it is difficult to know when the shell of the resonator is in fact close to resonating. It is therefore difficult to select the size of the radiators to be spaced about the shell to provide the optimum acoustic output. U.S. Pat. No. 4,624,401, for example, proposes to determine the resonance of the shell by first placing acoustic radiation against the shell, thus developing an acoustic output from the shell b7e8fd5c8
