The purpose of subtitles is to tell the movie or television audience what is happening on-screen. Subtitles are usually embedded in the video file, or if so, are separate text files that can be viewed and read simultaneously with the video. Some video files do not have subtitles, and need to be added using a separate program. Subtitles can be added as a single subtitle track to a video file or as multiple subtitle tracks, each with a different language, meaning that the screen reader can read any language once they have found it. Subtitles are usually a subset of the original language, such as French, German, or Spanish, and are intended for the audience of that particular country. Subtitles are often designed to convey some aspect of the dialog in a film. In this way, subtitles are related to dubbing, in which the dialog is dubbed in a foreign language rather than subtitled. Subtitles should be written so that they are legible for audiences of different ages, as well as those with different abilities, such as those who have difficulty reading. They should be fairly simple and concise, without too much extraneous information. A few programs are designed to automatically read and display subtitles in a video file. They are called "subtitle trackers".
