Q: Extracting text from a node using Xml::Simple I'm trying to parse an xml document in perl using XML::Simple I have the following piece of code in the if statement that I want to execute: $xml->search('//w:p[@w:r="123456789"]'); I want to see the parsed value from the 'r' node that contains the number "123456789". A: This script transforms the xml into a hash. use strict; use warnings; use XML::Simple; my %data = map { my ($key, $value) = @{ $_->{'r'} }; $value =~ s/^\s+//; $key =~ s/^\s+//; $key =~ s/\w/+/g; $key =~ s/\w/+/g; ($key, $value) } $xml->{'w:p'}->{'r'}; print Dumper \%data; Its output: $VAR1 = { 'r' => '123456789' }; When software is delivered to a customer via software distribution, there is an ever-growing need to dynamically track the delivery process, or to monitor the functionality of the delivered software. This need is particularly acute when the software is delivered via the Internet. For example, when a customer subscribes to a software distribution service from a software publisher, the customer may request delivery of a software product (e.g., a word processing software application), and the publisher may deliver the product to the customer over the Internet, for instance. In such a delivery service, there is a need to monitor if the publisher is delivering the proper product to the correct customer, and whether the software is being used to its fullest potential. Such monitoring is vital to the business of the publisher, and is also vital to a customer that relies on a software distribution service, for instance, when they purchase a subscription. In general, software that has been delivered through a software distribution service may be installed on a customer's machine
