Benicar price in indiaWe have students all over the world doing research, but we mostly teach our students in the Pacific Northwest. During the day, you can see photos of our projects on our blog. Thanksgiving week and this year's earthquake relief were a perfect occasion for Alex and I to participate in a collaborative art project, for which we needed a vehicle to carry the beach objects to the project site. Anybody looking at the ocean during a tsunami could see hundreds of glass floats washing into shore. We decided to take a glass recycling truck, turned it into a mobile sea art gallery, added a large cross for tsunami relief, and went to the beach with our collection. The image was taken from the beach beside our project site. I love it when my students hand in their project work. This is more than an assignment. My students have been working in their studio, and it took a couple of weeks to get it all put together. This project is as much a reflection of the culture as it is a reflection of the skills I teach them. Here's an overview of where we took it: The project started at home, with an assignment to research their cultures. This is a typical assignment for all my students, but it's one that took some time. Working from the beginning of February to the end of March, we researched cultures by looking at tourist brochures and using Facebook and sites like Google to look for photos of locations from their culture. We looked at the pictures and tried to think about how the pictures were promoted. We became a bit obsessed with Western culture, and I think Alex said it best: "If I live in North America, I'm a North American. If I live in Asia, I'm
