Three major host-pathogen interactions are crucial to viral infection. The first of these is the major receptor of retroviruses: the sialic acid-containing glycosphingolipid, CDw37. In normal cells, CDw37 is strongly down regulated by viral infection. In contrast, its expression is up regulated by the aberrant infection of tumors, leading to the hypothesis that CDw37 expression is a critical early event in cell transformation. Using a CDw37 x CDw37 K1 killer cell system, we have found a novel cytokine, IL-2 receptor beta chain, which is strongly expressed on transformed but not normal lymphocytes. IL-2 receptor expression on the killer T cells is capable of down regulating the level of IL-2 receptors on the target cells, causing target cell death. IL-2 receptor beta chain will provide a logical target for inhibition of CDw37 expression and cell killing in tumor cells, which are characterized by increased IL-2 receptor beta chain expression. We will manipulate the expression of IL-2 receptor beta chain on the killer T cells in order to selectively enhance CDw37 expression on the tumor cells and assess whether the CDw37 x CDw37 killer cell system can be utilized in killing of human tumors. This is a natural extension of our discovery of the killer T cell system but will involve a scientific and immunological challenge to develop a new immunotherapy based on killer T cells. In the development of HIV-1, the early state, prior to viral expression and production, is the time when the infection may be halted, and CD4+ T-cells infected with HIV-1 can be expanded. Our research indicates that this can be accomplished by eliminating CD4+ infected T cells from peripheral blood, and the gp120 envelope protein produced from the remaining T cells is then used to stimulate uninfected T cells. By our in vitro assay, we will develop a means to expand and propagate these HIV-1 subunifacients in vitro for potential therapeutic use in vivo. Monday, October 29, 2011
