Thirty-four patients with primary hyperlipoproteinaemia were treated for 18-24 months with dietary regimens aimed at reducing the total fat intake to 30-40% of the dietary calories, and the dietary cholesterol intake to 10-20% of the total daily dietary caloric intake. Blood cholesterol, triglyceride and phospholipid concentrations fell significantly (P less than 0.01) during the 18-month treatment period. No significant changes in lipoprotein lipase activity or apolipoprotein B content of the plasma were found as a function of dietary treatment. Increased HDL concentrations, however, tended to be related to a better response to dietary treatment. Based on analysis of variance it was concluded that the antilipidemic effect of the low-fat and cholesterol-reduced diet is consistent. The lowering of blood triglyceride levels appeared to be related to the reduction of weight.
