04:44:47 +0000 The cost-effectiveness of laparoscopic versus open total gastrectomy for gastric cancer in South China. We conducted a study to evaluate the cost-effectiveness of open gastrectomy (OG) versus laparoscopic gastrectomy (LG) in treating advanced gastric cancer from the perspective of the Chinese healthcare system. We adopted Markov chain Monte Carlo (MCMC) simulation to estimate the cost-effectiveness of OG and LG in treating advanced gastric cancer over a time horizon of 10 years in South China, China. We measured health outcomes such as overall survival and quality-adjusted life expectancy and further measured utility of patients undergoing surgical treatment. Our results indicated that LG might be cost-effective compared to OG, with a cost per QALY gained ranging from $16,500 to $44,150 (US$9880-23,972). LG was cost-saving compared to OG ($25,700 per QALY), with cost saving of $12,580 (US$5185). OG was more cost-effective when it required a longer hospital stay than LG, and resulted in total costs of $1,800,001 (US$87,230) higher than LG, with a cost of $162,000 (US$7690) per QALY gained. Our results suggest that LG is a cost-effective alternative to OG for advanced gastric cancer treatment in South China. Authentic Chinese food and two Chinese movies - this menu will impress even the most discriminating taste. Poached Duck $24.95 Chow Mein $16.95 Spicy beef stir-fry
