Sulfur containing polymers such as polymers prepared from sulfur-containing polymeric prepolymers such as polysulfide polymers have excellent physical properties. However, they are generally expensive and cannot be used in many applications. They are also susceptible to attack by polar environments and attack by UV light. Addition of various stabilizers may be effective in preventing the attack of such polymers by oxygen or water or both. The stabilizer may be either a radical scavenger or a light stabilizer. These stabilizers which are usually complex molecules may not be desirable. Some stabilizers may also be fugitive in nature and may be lost by volatilization during the use of the polymer or may migrate to the surface of the polymer. Many of the basic stabilizers are organofluorine compounds. These basic stabilizers are generally weak with respect to ultraviolet light. They are capable of forming excited states and thereby effectively deactivate sensitizers such as UV absorbers, but they are weak in the basic state. They may have a tendency to form complexes with the initiator and thus prevent polymerization. Moreover, a wide variety of organofluorine compounds are known, but some are highly toxic, while others are difficult to handle. In U.S. Pat. No. 4,308,377, copolymers of tetrafluoroethylene and sulfur-containing monomers were used to prepare articles which had improved resistance to high temperature exposure and to organic solvents. One of the disadvantages of this process
