

The first thing to notice about FIFA 22 is the almost complete overhaul of the template engine. Early in development of FIFA 22, the engine was tested on the Talents team, (sniper, free kick taker, etc.) on just about every small portion of the pitch. Using this information, EA Vancouver architected the engine for highly accurate, visually pleasing on-pitch motions. The engine is currently being tweaked and re-integrated on the full playable demo. From a gameplay and technical standpoint, FIFA 22 leverages the new engine to push the envelope with physics more realistically than ever before. In FIFA 22, players now react physically when taking a shot, such as an overlap or a long throw, and enemies more realistically react to those shots. FIFA also replicates the 'feel' of natural ball flight; balls fly through the air and tumble, deflections naturally occur in the air, and the ball's trajectory is dependent on the angle of the flight. The new engine is also being used to create a unique form of motion capture data, called "HyperMotion Technology," which will allow for a much more realistic depiction of ball play. During play, players using HyperMotion technology will perform better on-pitch movements, the ball will look more realistic and the motions will run faster and more fluid on screen. In the coming weeks, EA Vancouver will show footage of the HyperMotion technology in action. "We are trying to push the envelope again in terms of how to bring players in a much more authentic way to the pitch," said FIFA lead gameplay architect Matt Prior. "When you put a player in a motion capture suit, if you put them in a moving vehicle, it's a lot easier to capture their movements. In the past, we did motion capture and we were not really capturing physical movement, so we were still limited by how our animation was done. If we want to take soccer to a new level, this will change it." FIFA 22 will feature an improved squad system, allowing multiple manager tactics to be employed across a player's career. Squad transfer history will also be presented in a much clearer manner and can be viewed on a player's profile, making roster management easier than ever. EA Vancouver is also looking to improve the variety of events a manager can affect on a career, and with more variety to encounter, more players can be seen finding success. "
