While these increases have drastically improved the quality of life for professional athletes, their salaries have traditionally been paid by their teams, often in the form of an equity stake in the team itself. Because professional players are constrained in what they can do to generate revenue, most professional athletes devote their talent solely toward increasing their team's profitability. Therefore, players routinely jockey for team memberships in their goal of securing substantial monetary compensation from their teams, through a variety of legal maneuvers including, but not limited to, holding out, asking for a trade, and player-initiated legal action. Holding out is deemed especially important because the negotiating power of each player is effectively equal.

The negotiating power of a team is, however, typically immeasurably greater than that of any individual player. Holding out is a process of playing hardball with the owners of the team.

The Reelin protein is an important component of the Reelin signaling pathway, which is known to play essential roles in neuronal migration, synaptic maturation, and adult neurogenesis. In this review, we summarize recent advances in the roles of Reelin in neural stem cells (NSCs). Reelin directs the fate of NSCs and promotes their proliferation, neuronal differentiation and cell survival in both fetal and adult neural progenitors. It was also found to be important for the process of lineage-specific differentiation of embryonic neural stem cells. Reelin is also required for maintaining NSCs in specific brain regions, and its deficiency causes morphological abnormalities in the NSC pool. Therefore, Reelin is likely to play a critical role in the maintenance and repair of neural circuits in the adult brain. In addition, this review discusses the potential applications of Reelin and related proteins in the development of stem cell-based therapies for neurological diseases, such as neural development and neurodegeneration.
