It will be interesting to see how this will work, given the caveat that while FIFA has always been "inspired by the world's best footballers," it has never been accurate, and so it's always been notoriously difficult to figure out what's happening in the action on the pitch, even if the players are very clearly doing it. So can it be done? How will it work? And how will the most exciting looking games in football compare to real football? Watch this quick video to see exactly what we're talking about. It's been a good week for football fans. The NFL recently held their annual draft in a stadium that used to be the home of the Los Angeles Rams. The average age of the players taken was one year older than when the draft was held last year. This speaks to a youth movement in the NFL. Fans of European football have enjoyed Champions League Round of 16 action in which four of Europe's top clubs played in the knockout rounds, while many in South America have been glued to their TVs as a battle for the top seed in the Copa Libertadores went into extra time. And finally, English Premier League footballers watched from the stands as Barcelona defeated English side Chelsea in the Champions League Round of 16. The morning after, another battle in the Copa Libertadores continues, as the number one seeded Colombian side Atletico Nacional takes on Argentine side River Plate, with it ending in a 1-1 draw and both teams being eliminated from the tournament. River had the better of the first match, winning 5-0 on aggregate, with Atletico Nacional winning 2-1 and the away goals rule earning them a spot in the quarterfinals. River will play Sporting Lisbon from Portugal in the Round of 16. Atletico Nacional is coached by Juan Carlos Osorio, a former national team manager and Olympic Soccer Manager for 2008. Osorio is a well-respected man in the world of soccer, with his former teams having won a total of 17 Gold Medals while he was their manager. He has spent 11 years coaching at the youth level, and in the offseason he coaches Mexico's U23 team, which has won three Gold Medals, and the U20 team, which has earned its first success. Osorio began coaching in Colombia with the youth teams of Atletico Nacional, and he went on to coach the Colombian national team during their successful qualification for the 2010 FIFA
