It covers the meaning of health and illness in the contexts of both western and non-western cultures and includes a succinct overview of the main concepts that nurses need to know in order to inform care and practice. It offers a number of theoretical frameworks which are used to explore the subject and provides a number of thematic perspectives that highlight the complexity of our relationship with illness. The book draws on the views and experience of a group of nurses who deal with issues of health and illness in clinical practice, and who are influenced by a variety of different theoretical perspectives. It focuses on the relationship between individual and society, the ways in which illness and health are experienced and how people respond to and are influenced by their illness, and the concept of health, which incorporates the notion of health as belonging to the individual and wider societal context. The book examines the importance of the body, the mind and spirit in relation to health and illness, as well as the related concepts of body image, self-image and bodily identity, and incorporates a number of case studies to illustrate the book's main points. The book was written by Emma Lycett, Penelope Doody, Steve Hammond and Nicola Martin. The book is published by Search Publications in 2011. A balloon-tipped catheter was used to measure pulmonary artery (PA) input impedance during supine bicycle exercise testing in 26 patients with suspected PAH, 13 with PAH and 13 healthy control subjects. To avoid overestimation of PA vascular resistance during exercise, we used the well-known esophageal catheter test and constructed PA input
