This is a tool that will sell itself!!!Allergen detection by immunochromatography: an alternative for standard allergen detection. Due to the increasing prevalence of allergic diseases, the number of patients referred for allergen-specific IgE testing has risen enormously. However, IgE diagnostics have to be conducted in a laboratory, which requires experienced staff, expensive and outdated instrumentation and the use of highly purified allergens. Recently, easy-to-use, user-friendly allergen detection techniques have been introduced, but these methods are sometimes limited by the sensitivity of the detection system. Therefore, we aimed to evaluate a simple allergen detection method based on the immunochromatographic system Fastline. We performed a direct comparison of conventional and Fastline allergen detection for latex and birch pollen at different stages of sample collection (serum, plasma, whole blood). In addition, we included a performance comparison with standard labelling of PRIST. The results show that the Fastline version of allergen detection has no disadvantages compared with other laboratory methods, such as PRIST, but also other immune diagnostics, such as ELISA or FAB. Furthermore, the results obtained with Fastline were comparable to those of PRIST. Therefore, Fastline seems to be an attractive
