some of its users, based on location history and other details that may not be provided when you request a route. Google is calling it "Will This Take Me There?" It shows a camera-driven car (or bikes, for cyclists) pointing to a chosen destination. The service will be available in English. The first two use cases are navigation on the desktop (search for a route, or use a smartphone app) and personal tours (enables a specific route, and optionally other modes for groups and etc). The first feature, "Will This Take Me There?" is already available today in beta for selected users. "If you've ever turned a loved one on to Google Maps, you know that we often recommend a particular route when they ask you for directions," Google Maps product manager Alex Kuzmeski said. "This is your chance to see what they'd see. Take the controls and navigate to their next destination." On desktop, select the type of direction you want. Google will then automatically recognize the location by either your location history or perhaps a saved place in Google Maps. Tap the What's Next icon to select a mode, such as Driving or Walking, and the route is plotted for you. The service is in beta today, but an exact release date is coming soon
