resulted in miniaturization of the production of solar cells by increasing the efficiency of the cell during the early years of the 1970s. The cells shown here have a working area of 0.6 cm^2 , a thickness of $90 \text{ }\mu\text{m}$ and a cell efficiency of 1.26%. The transparent conductive electrode (anode) is made of fluorine-doped tin oxide (FTO) and the cathode is made of platinum. The blue shade shows the bottom chamber. The Grätzel cell has been included in the Technische Universität Berlin (TU Berlin) university library collection since 2001 and is the oldest solar cell that can be found in this collection.

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a self-drying oven for the post-treatment of webs. More particularly, the present invention relates to a self-drying oven which has at least one cyclone and means for providing a jet of air.

2. Description of Background and Relevant Information The post-treatment of webs is used to confer to them a desired characteristic. For example, web treatment and drying treatment are performed in order to confer strength properties to these webs, and they may consist in drying, thereby eliminating water droplets which had been applied to the surface of the web. Drying of the web may also consist in using thermal energy in order to evaporate a water-soluble substance. For example, fixing of the dye present on a printed web, with the fixing being in the form of chemical reaction between the dye and the fixing agent, is performed so as to confer coloration to the web. It is thus seen that treatment of the web consists in drying its surface. Such treatment of webs thus generally consists in drying the surface of the web. d0c515b9f4
