Selecting Images in Photoshop Even if you have no desire to retouch images, Photoshop is still an extremely powerful tool. You can choose a photo on your computer screen, highlight it, and then click the Select tool to select it. Once you have selected an image, you can edit it as you would a regular drawing—you can cut, copy, and paste any part of the photo into your drawing. * * * #

Choosing whether to use Photoshop or Gimp Adobe Photoshop has become the industry standard, but it has its drawbacks. Gimp, the free and open-source alternative, is also excellent and is probably the fastest Photoshop alternative you'll find. It's easy to use, and it costs nothing. The Gimp interface, however, is much more clean, simple, and intuitive than the Photoshop interface. Gimp may also be a bit faster than Photoshop. ## Aviary Similar to PicMonkey, Aviary is a paid photo editor you can use online without any Adobe Photoshop experience or knowledge. Aviary gives you a color-accurate photo editor that features the most popular editing tools found in Photoshop. Aviary provides an easy online way to edit and share photos and video in real time. * * * # Multiple editing tools Many of the editing tools, such as healing tools, crop tools, adjustment layers, layer masks, and selection tools, are available both in Aviary and in the free online edition of Photoshop. ## Aperture Aperture is a very simple photo editor but has some great editing tools. Aperture is a free online photography editor that includes basic editing tools, such as cropping, canvas editing, and dark-and-light effects. Like PicMonkey, Aperture can easily be used on the web or from the desktop. # Adobe Photoshop Express Adobe Photoshop Express, or "PSE," is a simple, online photo editor that enables users to easily browse and edit photos from their mobile device.

PSE can also be accessed by uploading images from mobile devices and computers.

When editing photos in PSE, you can crop and rotate a photo and add effects to it.

Basic editing includes white balance, exposure, color balance, and tone; you can also adjust vignetting

Cellular mechanisms mediating neuronal death in neurodegenerative diseases. Multiple sclerosis (MS) is a chronic and degenerative neurological disease of the central nervous system (CNS) that affects about 400,000 Americans. In the later phases of the disease, neurodegeneration (loss of myelin) and demyelination (dissolution of myelin) ultimately cause permanent disability. The mechanisms that trigger and/or drive the progression of this disease are poorly understood. Recent studies of experimental models of MS (experimental allergic encephalomyelitis (EAE) and MS) indicate that loss of axonal integrity and neurodegeneration occur with or without demyelination. A combination of genetic or acquired defects in cellular and molecular pathways that regulate axonal growth, maintenance, and degeneration (such as Nogo/RGM, lymphotoxin-beta-1 and CD44) have been shown to contribute to the loss of axonal integrity in EAE, MS, and other neurodegenerative diseases such as stroke and Parkinson's disease. Of particular interest is the fact that neuronal degeneration can occur in the absence of demyelination. Recent evidence also indicates that in MS axonal degeneration may be the initiating cause of clinical disease rather than inflammation. This novel hypothesis would explain many of the inconsistencies in the current understanding of the pathogenesis of MS, including the poor correlation between the inflammatory response to myelin antigens and the clinical manifestations of the disease. This review focuses on current evidence for the involvement of intrinsic cellular mechanisms in the neurodegenerative process of MS, describing some of the genetic or acquired defects in cellular and molecular pathways that may contribute to the initiation or progression of axonal degeneration in MS. An understanding of these mechanisms may be helpful in the identification of new therapeutic targets for slowing or halting disease progression in MS. Brockton Felonies

By: Interim Assistant City Attorney, Doug Pacheco on October 26, 2013 Brockton Felonies
A Brockton woman was arrested on suspicion of furnishing marijuana to a minor after she sold marijuana to an undercover police officer in Brockton on Oct. 23. Officers from the Brockton Police Department's narcotics unit were conducting undercover operations to target the sale of marijuana from retailers and street corners in the vicinity of Brockton's Northgate Square. The officers first observed a vehicle pull to the side of U.S. Route 3 near Brockton's

SALEM — Oregon officials on Wednesday agreed to extend their moratorium on taking wolves off the endangered list, several months after voters rejected a ballot measure to overturn it. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service had proposed lifting the wolf protection in 2011, but it didn't provide details on how the agency planned to monitor and manage the threatened animals. In a recent proposal, the agency said it would work to raise the population in the northern Rocky Mountains to 500 animals by 2020, and it would spend $8.5 million to help ranchers and landowners protect livestock in the western states. Officials said the state's wolf population had increased from about 75 in 2010 to at least 185 animals. They also said the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service had the authority to revise its proposal and provide updates. Oregon has been a leader in efforts to restore gray wolves, which were declared endangered in 1975. The population in the state fluctuates between 50 and 120 animals, most of which are in the southern part of the state, where they were once plentiful. A ballot measure to lift the moratorium was defeated by a wide margin during last November's general election. In Portland, where voters approved the measure by a more narrow margin, opposition to the proposal was almost universal. Oregon officials said the previous system of counting wolves only in packs that killed livestock was flawed, and they promised to provide a more reliable system for monitoring the numbers. Some Oregon ranchers have argued that wolves are a threat to livestock and wildlife, but the state's four largest livestock producers have said they can handle the animals. "We look forward to working with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to manage Oregon's wolves," Chris Glaser, Oregon's secretary of state, said in a statement Wednesday. "The population is at a healthy size, and we anticipate the department will be able to assess and document the wolves' impact." After lifting the moratorium, officials want to begin removing protections from some wolves for the first time. The Oregon legislature has allocated $300,000 to a state wildlife department to create a management plan for wolves, and officials said they would begin enforcing rules on the animals as soon as that money was approved. Since the ruling, U.S. Rep. Earl Blumenauer, D-Portland, has been working on legislation that would restore protections for wolves in the northwestern and central parts of the state, where the population density
