Attachment theory posits that the relationship between childhood maltreatment and substance use is moderated by an individual's attachment style. However, research linking adult attachment to adolescent alcohol use is scarce and mostly restricted to adolescents who report child maltreatment. Moreover, research on an attachment moderating role in the relationship between child maltreatment and adolescent alcohol use is lacking altogether. The purpose of this study was to examine the relationship between childhood maltreatment and adolescent alcohol use among adolescents with varying attachment styles. Participants were 170 adolescents (M = 13.9 years; 91.8% male) from a community-based, low-income sample. Participants completed measures of attachment style and retrospective assessment of maltreatment and alcohol use. Results indicated that childhood maltreatment and alcohol use were associated, regardless of attachment style. Adolescents with avoidant attachment reported more childhood maltreatment and were more often classified as heavy alcohol users. Adolescents with anxious and preoccupied attachment did not differ in terms of maltreatment and alcohol use. Results are discussed in terms of the clinical relevance of attachment theory for clinicians working with maltreated adolescents. Postgraduate Education In providing healthcare, there is no one-size-fits-all practice for our clients. We respect each client's unique situation and develop individualized plans to move the client along the continuum of recovery. Our Advanced Postgraduate Education programs are designed to assist clients in achieving their health and wellness goals, regardless of their current level of wellness. An accredited 12-month program is designed to provide our clients with what we feel is the most valuable information about health, wellness and the recovery process. A minimum of 24 contact hours is required for completion of the course, as well as at least 2 hours of one-on-one time with a clinician. We recognize that the 12-month Advanced Postgraduate Education program is the optimal length for completing
