Arginine (Arg) metabolism and the growth hormone (GH) response to Arg were investigated in malignant solid tumors. All ten patients studied had no evidence of liver, renal or lymph-node metastases. There was no significant difference between the GH responses to Arg and L-Arg (2.9 +/- 0.9 vs. 3.7 +/- 1.2 microunits/ml, p greater than 0.05) in all eight patients with solid tumors. Compared with the control value of 0.35 +/- 0.02 microunits/ml, only one patient had a significantly higher GH response to Arg than L-Arg (1.7 vs. 0.48 microunits/ml, p less than 0.005) and two patients had an early GH response to Arg (33 and 60 min after injection), which was not observed after L-Arg. In the patients studied, a significant correlation was observed between the GH response to Arg or L-Arg and the plasma levels of sex-hormone-binding globulin (SHBG), but not testosterone. In contrast, the plasma testosterone level did not correlate with the GH response to Arg or L-Arg. The results indicate that the GH response to Arg is not associated with the tumor-related status and that the role of SHBG in the regulation of the GH response to Arg remains to be elucidated.
