I am working on a "simple" interactive form that allows customers to input variables and receive a report based on those variables. As I am looking to make it very easy for customers to use the program, I was thinking of using MySQL databases in conjunction with my PHP scripts. Does a MySQL database contain 1 table or a database for each variable or the report? Is it an easier way to store information if the database was designed to store that information? I was thinking of creating 1 database that would house all the variables so that a user could input those variables into the form and save the data by inserting a row into a table. The variables include order number, customers name, etc. The other tables and form fields would be to receive the information. The reason I ask is because what I am writing for the form is going to contain a lot of fields so adding a new field would be very simple. Adding a new variable would be a challenge and so having a database that has a variable table would be great. From what I have read about MySQL I am thinking that I have read things out of context and would appreciate any comments, examples, guidance or ideas. Thanks

A: does a MySQL database contain 1 table or a database for each variable or the report? A full database is a table of tables... if you will. A table can hold related data. is it an easier way to store information if the database was designed to store that information? A db
