An outbreak of infectious gastroenteritis at the Orkney Islands in Scotland was linked to an outbreak of Cryptosporidium infections in the English Channel earlier in the year and resulted in at least 285 people being hospitalised and 139 being treated in the community. As of April 20, the number of cases and deaths had not yet been revised. Infections peaked in March, with the largest numbers of cases reported in Shetland. These findings were reported by researchers from the University of Aberdeen in the Lancet Infectious Diseases. The Edinburgh-based team of researchers analysed data on laboratory-confirmed cryptosporidiosis cases during the period April 2014-March 2017, collecting information from public health and hospital records. They also conducted a questionnaire survey in Shetland from January to August 2017. Cryptosporidiosis infections were reported by individuals, while a number of case clusters suggested an outbreak was ongoing. Around 18% of the respondents had experienced gastroenteritis symptoms while travelling. Around three in five said that the illness made them feel unwell but only half had sought medical advice. advertisement Over half of the cases reported that they had become ill after visiting friends and relatives in Shetland, with around one in ten becoming ill after visiting the Islands for the first time. Alcohol was mentioned as a trigger for cryptosporidiosis in 26% of the reported cases in Shetland. In response to the questionnaire, the local health services investigated all cases of gastroenteritis from January to August 2017. In total, 286 cases of gastroenteritis were reported. Cases aged 20-39 years and those in Shetland were more likely to be at risk of developing long-lasting symptoms, with over half of these cases having been reported over the past year. The outbreak peaked in March with around 56% of the cases being reported in April and May. Around 285 cases required hospital admission and 139 cases were reported in the community. Of the patients who required hospital admission, the mean length of stay was 4.2 days. The researchers noted that "despite our analysis being based on laboratory-confirmed cases, the actual numbers of cryptosporidiosis cases in Scotland are likely to be much higher. This is because the vast majority of cases are self-limiting, causing few or no symptoms. This could also be the case for the English Channel." The study authors note that the
