Roblox is a user-generated, construction-focused multiplayer game creation platform and game environment. The platform, which allows players to create games and then play or "build" with friends on the platform, was founded by Dave Baszucki and Erik Cassel. The company has since been acquired by ROLX, LLC, a subsidiary of The Chernin Group, a wholly owned subsidiary of FOX, and is operated under their banner as Roblox Studio. The Roblox platform currently consists of two core areas: (1) a game area, where players create and play custom mini-games called "Blocks," and (2) a user-generated content area, where players produce and share user-created content in the form of "gems," "rooms," and other user-generated objects. These gems are then used to build objects in the game area. Since the initial launch of the platform in September 2006, Roblox has developed a community of more than 164 million monthly active users, including more than half of all American children under the age of 16. Among the categories of games that are featured on Roblox are building games, creative games, dress-up games, first-person shooters, fighting games, platform games, and racing games. A player's progress in a game is saved to their own Roblox account, and thus, users are able to play the same game on multiple devices, including laptops and tablets. Roblox is designed for children to play on the platform but has also attracted users in the teenage and adult communities. Though Roblox was initially developed as a platform for building various types of games, its most popular aspect has become a game platform where players build and play with friends by creating "game objects." These game objects can be anything from a drawing of an object or character, to a virtual house or vehicle, to an in-game movie. These game objects are referred to as "Blocks." Players can then use custom materials to customize the game objects; either by decorating blocks with colored paint, or by using the objects' own stylized character graphics (see also: skins). In addition, players can build and customize these objects. A "Room" is the area in which these blocks are placed. Once a block is placed inside a Room, that block becomes removable and the player can place any other block, thereby "building" the object. Users can enter and join games created by other users, as well as "play" free games
